To Whom It May Concern

During his internship at Fortune Business Insights, Arya Kadarkar proactively approached me with a request to shadow my work for a short period. This was an unusual request, as interns are rarely granted direct access to executive-level operations, but Arya's determination, enthusiasm, and clear desire to learn prompted me to approve it. Over the month that followed, he made full use of the opportunity, engaging thoughtfully in our strategic discussions and demonstrating a strong ability to absorb high-level business insights.

Our interactions involved high-level discussions around market dynamics, competitive positioning, and client strategy. Arya grasped these concepts quickly and consistently asked thoughtful questions that reflected a genuine eagerness to understand the broader impact of my decisions. His curiosity was not only admirable but allowed him to contribute meaningfully to conversations well beyond the scope of his role.

He carried himself with professionalism, showed humility in learning, and exhibited confidence when contributing ideas. What stood out was his ability to connect granular data with larger business objectives, something rare in interns and highly valued in any impactful role within a company.

With his background in computer science, paired with a growing interest in business systems and analytics, Arya is uniquely positioned to succeed in roles that demand both technical fluency and strategic insight. I fully support his pursuit of graduate studies in Information Systems and have no doubt he will bring value wherever he goes.

Sincerely
Mr. Rahu Bhandari
